Locks, keys, freedom: Houdini makes a comeback in southeast Michigan

Elisabeth Diaemer, special to the WJN

Ladies and Gentlemen — step this way and take your seats. You’re in for an amazing show! Coming to a theater near you is the legendary escape artist Harry Houdini as imagined by Muriel Rukeyser, a prolific American author and among the most important post-WWII Jewish writers. First performed in 1973, with Christopher Walken as Houdini and Neva Small as Bess, the musical Houdini combines singing and dancing, comedy, and pathos.

While capturing Houdini’s transformation from Hungarian-born Eric Weiss, son of a rabbi, to the most celebrated escape artist of all times, the musical dramatizes the tension between the escape artist who can break any lock and the man who is inescapably bound to his mother, to his wife Bess, and to the very myth he helped create. Along the way, the play challenges us to consider how we respond to gender inequality, racial bigotry, and the play challenges us to consider how we respond to gender inequality, racial bigotry, religious persecution, and the power of magic. The musical’s candid language and poem-songs will appeal to many, young and old.

though it’s likely not for younger children. The song “Yes” invites us to abandon caution and open ourselves to surprise and the unknown: “Open your eyes, / Dream but don’t guess. / Your biggest surprise / Comes after yes.” Another song, “Chains, Freedom, Keys,” compels us to imagine the chains that imprison us and the keys to freedom in our reach, both as individuals and communities. In “I Make My Magic,” Houdini reveals the sources of his magic as coming from “...forgotten things / Night and nightmare and the midnight wings / Of childhood butterflies — / And the darkness, the straining dark / Underwater and under sleep —” Houdini did his most dangerous exploit in Detroit, when, as a publicity stunt, he leaped from Belle Isle Bridge — handcuffed, chained, and leg-ironed — into the icy Detroit River. As legend has it, the river was frozen, and he entered it through a small hole in the ice. Rukeyser’s musical devotes a gripping scene to Houdini’s narrow escape from death. Twenty years later, in 1926, Houdini performed his last show in Detroit, even though he suffered from a burst appendix. He died a week later in Detroit’s Grace Hospital. To help us fight the doldrums of COVID, winter, and the multitude of “locks” that constrain us, Eastern Michigan University’s Muriel Rukeyser Living Archive is putting on four public events dedicated to Houdini. Each event combines a staged reading of the play with lively conversation about Rukeyser and the great magician: March 20, 2 p.m., Sponberg Theatre, Eastern Michigan University March 24, 7 p.m., Riverside Arts Center, Ypsilanti, Michigan March 26, 8 p.m., Matix Theatre, Detroit, Michigan March 27, 2 p.m., Matix Theatre, Detroit, Michigan

Hannah Davis, special to the WJN

Idelle Hammond-Sass, a member of the Ann Arbor Reconstructionist Congregation and a local artist working in painting, sculpture, metal working, and jewelry making, has won the Shmita Prize contest in the Ritual Object category in the Shmita Project contest sponsored by Hazon.

This year in the Jewish calendar, 5782 (from September 6, 2021, to September 22, 2022), is shmita, a year where “God commands us to let the land rest, release debts, resolve disputes, and open our hands and hearts to those in need.” The Shmita Project aims to reimage this ancient tradition in an era when most of us don’t live directly off the land or rely on the rhythms of the natural world in our lives. What does it mean to let the land rest when we don’t interact with the land?

According to the Shmita Project, “The Shmita Prizes award artists and creatives — from all levels of experience and age groups — for works of art that bring into focus the relevancy and application of shmita values in our contemporary world. These art works offer creative avenues with which to prepare for, mark, and engage with the shmita year.” Pieces were submitted in categories of Ritual Object, Fine Art, Film/Video, Performance Art/Music/Liturgy, and Written Word. A committee of artists, including an author, an actor, a musician, a museum research assistant, and a performance artist, judged the entries and selected the winners.

Idelle’s piece is called “Renewing Shmita.” It is made with hemispheres of wood surrounding a copper archway with a bowl on top, two candlesticks with the word “shmita” etched in English and Hebrew, and four small brass dishes: seven pieces in total, echoing the seventh year of shmita. The piece, Idelle says, was intended to help explore the creation of a personal shmita ritual. There are no pre-ordained uses for its parts, unlike the items on a Passover seder plate.

Idelle said she had to start by asking the question, “what is a ritual?” Key parts of shmita tradition involve not cultivating the land, and only eating food that can be foraged or that was stored from previous years. How to represent the idea of having enough to provide for your community for the whole year? This concept doesn’t have to apply to food: we sustain ourselves on many other things too. The brass dishes in the piece offer options for physicality, places to interact with your ritual, perhaps by putting items in them that represent a wish for abundance or “enough-ness” for the year.

The word “shmita” means “release,” Traditionally this involved letting go of debts and obligations to others, but it could also be a very personal release: from assumptions, from workaholism, or from perfectionism. Idelle suggested setting an intention for the year of things you’re ready to let go of. She intentionally chose to make the piece very open-ended, stating that it would be limiting Purim marks two years since the COVID-19 shutdowns, and with re-starting in-person gatherings, it is truly the season of our joy. But also the season of, I don’t know what to call it, stress responses, forgetfulness, absent-mindedness; does “pandemic brain” cover it? If you are experiencing this too, I hope you will be easy on yourself and others.

In planning with Rabbi Winston and Rachel Levy for the March 20 “Reimagining 21st Century Jewish Community” get together, I came across the sponsors of ReBoot’s Shavuot series (some people really plan ahead), featuring an all-night listen to Thelonious Monk’s “Round Midnight.” The sponsors include LABA: A Laboratory for Jewish Culture; Jewish Emergent Network; Lab/Shul; The Kitchen; Romenu: Jewish Life Elevated; and several other organizations whose names themselves are filled with the joy of Jewish creativity.

I’m a Baptist, but one of my students at the Reconstructionist congregation outdid me. He said, “I don’t look at whether the glass is half full or half empty but I know the glass is refillable.” How beautiful is that? Happy Purim.

An exchange of letters prompted by the Ann Arbor City Council resolution on antisemitism: Who is an antisemite?

Dear Clare:

I live not far away from the site of the weekly demonstration so heatedly rejected by the Ann Arbor City Council. As I was born and raised in Israel and went to war to defend it in 1973, I’d like to say a few words about that decision by the council. Walking past these demonstrators and talking to them, I never saw or heard any antisemitic proclamations. They are opposed to Israel’s policy in the occupied West Bank. So am I. A few words about the profound difference between antisemitism and anti-Israeli protest are in order.

Unfortunately, Israel suffers from the presence of a small, but very active and vocal group of West Bank settlers and their sympathizers whose activities over the years included the mass murder of Muslims in prayer (Dr. Goldstein), the murder of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, the murder of several West Bank Palestinian residents, including children, and daily pogrom-like attacks on Arab villagers in the West Bank, occupied by Israel since 1967, which range from violent attacks on them, to attacks on their livestock, fencing off their access to water, cutting down their olive groves and destroying their property.

Recently the so-called “Boys of the Hills” from an illegal settlement have attacked several Israeli human rights activists and sent them to the hospital. Sadly, this activity is often tolerated and even actively supported by IDF soldiers. A few days ago, such Israeli soldiers killed an 80-year-old Palestinian for the crime of protesting their rough handling at a road block near his home. Unfortunately for those soldiers, the man turned out to be an American citizen, and the U.S. State Department had demanded an explanation, rejecting the usual weak excuses put forward by the IDF.

As most residents of communities such as Ann Arbor wouldn’t condone such terrorist activity, these “Boys of the Hills” and their supporters here try to muddy the water by making the preposterous claim that any protest against their activities is “Anti-Semitism.”

The situation in the occupied West Bank is complicated, and we must not jump to conclusions, nor should we allow murderers and terrorists, Jewish though they may be, to tarnish a legitimate demonstration in Ann Arbor against their activities and against Israeli policy as Anti-Semitism. Many Israelis are bravely protesting and reporting the crimes committed by the Jewish settlers, taking a great risk in doing so. To me, these are the true heroes of Israel today.

I’d like to believe the council, and the mayor, are misguided rather than the supporters of Jewish terrorism, and fell for a right wing propaganda from an unexpected quarter. I do understand that those whose synagogue became the weekly target of these protesters are not happy to assume the role of Israel’s representatives while they go about their worship and celebrate Jewish religious festivals. But perhaps it isn’t such a bad thing to have your deeply held convictions challenged on occasion!

Moshe Tzadie Burns Park

Moshe,

Thank you very much for writing.

I share your deep opposition to the occupation and to Israeli government, settlers, and right-wing actions to further disenfranchise Palestinians with whom Jews must eventually (as soon as possible) share the land.

And I agree that there are profound differences between antisemitism and protests against Israeli policy, as you say. However, signs that say “Jewish Power Corrupts” are antisemitic. Many signs the picketers hold have antisemitic messages. The picketers outside Beth Israel have “enudled the water” of legitimate protest with their choice to disturb religious practice and their antisemitism.

It is the picketers that made their choice to participate in and promote their activities as local pickups at Temple Beth Emeth in Ann Arbor.

Shaul Magid on Meir Kahane’s views on “exceptionalism”

Shaul Magid will deliver the 32nd David W. Belin Lecture in American Jewish Affairs, “God Shed His Light on Thee: American and Jewish Exceptionalism in the Thought of Meir Kahane.” Magid, professor of Jewish Studies at Dartmouth College and Senior Kogod Research Fellow at the Shalom Hartman Institute of North America, will be delivering the 32nd David W. Belin Lecture in American Jewish Affairs in a hybrid event on April 7, 2022. His most recent book [Meir Kahane: The Public Life and Political Thought of an American Jewish Radical] was published by Princeton University Press in 2021, and his lecture will explore notions of American exceptionalism and Jewish exceptionalism in the diasporic and Zionist thought of Meir Kahane. He will show how Kahane valued American democracy and viewed America as exceptional while at the same time felt that America could not ultimately protect the Jews. Alternatively, Jews had their own exceptional status that made them unique among collectives, and needed to express their claim to survival in comparative context with other radical movements of the time, specifically on race but also in regard to liberalism, nationalism, and Zionism. In today’s political climate, Magid believes that his chapter on race would be the most important takeaway for his audience because he explains that, “It is there I try to interrogate the ‘grammar of race’ [Kahane] used to make his point about the Jews and antisemitism. I use critical race theory, and more specifically Afropessimism, as a way to understand what was at stake for Kahane on race and how he used that to double back to antisemitism and Jewish identity.”

The Belin lecture series was established in 1991 through a generous gift from the late David W. Belin of Des Moines and New York to provide an academic forum for the discussion of contemporary Jewish life in the United States. Previous scholars to hold this honor include Deborah Lipstadt, Samuel Freedman, Ruth Messinger, Jim Loefler, Beth Wenger, and Lila Corwin Berman, among others. Each year, the lecture is also used that to double back to antisemitism and Jewish identity. Climate justice and the Jewish community
By Miriam Chesterman, Emily Gordon, and Moss Herberholz, special to the WIN

As the conversation about climate change and climate justice expands, so too does the Jewish community’s response. Second year students in the University of Michigan School of Social Work’s Jewish Communal Leadership Program (JCLP) are presenting these complex issues to the community in their annual Communal Conversation this spring. On Sunday, March 27th, from 1 to 3:30 p.m. via Zoom, “Climate Justice and the Jewish Community: A Call to Action Through Dialogue” will examine the current movement by the Jewish community towards a more environmentally just future.

JCLP students are excited to bring together a panel of dynamic voices with extensive knowledge on how Jewish communities can respond to growing calls for climate justice across the country and around the world. Intended speakers include Rabbi Ellen Bernstein, a pioneer in the field of religion and ecology, as well as an eco-theological leader, writer, and creative; Rabbi Isaiah Rothstein, a Black Jewish Rabbinic Scholar and Public Affairs Advisor at Jewish Federations of North America (JFNA) and leader of the JEDD (Jewish Equity, Diversity and Inclusion) and racial justice initiatives; Kristy Drutman, a Jewish-Filipina environmental media creator and founder of Brown Girl Green, a media platform exploring the intersections between media, diversity, and environmentalism; Sophia Rich, an Ann Arbor high school junior who is passionate about connecting Jewish principles and climate justice and is a member of the National Leadership Board for the Jewish Youth Climate Movement; and Vicki Kaplan, Director of Organizing at Dayenu, as well as an activist and campaigner committed to movement-building and anti-racism work. A resource list with both Jewish and non-Jewish organizations engaging in this important work will be shared with all tuning in.

Addressing issues pertinent to and involving the Jewish community is a pillar of JCLP. Everyone in southeast Michigan and beyond is invited to join for what is sure to be a thought-provoking afternoon. JCLP is proud to host this event, generously supported by the following organizations and synagogues: Jewish Communal Leadership Program, The Jean & Samuel Frankel Center for Judaic Studies, University of Michigan Hillel, University of Michigan Trotter Multicultural Center, University of Michigan Office of Diversity, Equity, and Inclusion, University of Michigan School of Social Work Student Union, Temple Beth Emet of Ann Arbor, Beth Israel Congregation of Ann Arbor, Repair the World, University of Michigan’s American Culture Department, Ann Arbor Reconstruc- tionist Congregation, and The Amir Project. In the Zone
By Sara Goldblach

The scene in the Hebrew Day School first-grade classroom was a quiet commotion of movement and voices as students created a craft during their social emotional learning (SEL) class. There were sticky fingers and dripping glue, expressions of intense concentration, and the periodic squeak of sneakers as a student rushed over to see something a friend had made. The general sense of engagement and contentment shifted when a child came over to the teacher table, clearly upset.

“I got this glue, but it doesn’t work!” she said, holding out her bottle of glue on the table, within arm’s reach of the student, were at least six unused bottles of glue, as well as other available craft materials.

“Hmm,” I said. “How are you going to solve that problem?”

The first grader’s face showed puzzlement.

“My glue doesn’t work,” she said again, more quietly. Though the majority of her expression was hidden behind her mask, I could see tears forming in her eyes.

“That sounds frustrating,” I replied. “It’s no fun to feel frustrated, but I know you can handle having that feeling while you think of a solution.” I moved slightly toward the unused bottles of glue sitting on the table.

“I can’t do the project without glue and this one doesn’t work!” the student’s voice was a crescendo of agitation. I took a deep breath, both to remind the student of ‘belly breathing’ as a calming tool, and also to steady my instincts to jump in and rescue by providing the solution. After a moment, I saw the first grader take several deep breaths.

“Maybe I could get a different glue,” she ventured.

“Great idea!” I said. “I like how you picked a strategy to calm down and then you thought of an answer. Impressive problem solving!” She wiped her tears, grabbed a new glue, and skipped away to get on with her project.

Two years ago, it would have been atypical to find a first grader dissolving into tears at the first sign of frustration and needing teacher support to solve a simple problem. However, as a consequence of the pandemic, teachers are finding young students with gaps in their social and emotional skills. Skills like resilience, independent problem solving, distress tolerance, self-regulation, empathy, and managing social conflicts are lagging in many young students.

These COVID years have meant reaffirming the foundational principle of caregiving: protection. To keep our vulnerable children safe, especially before vaccinations were available, adults have kept children home with fewer opportunities for free play with similar-age peers, and under close parental supervision. All of these have been safe, necessary measures by adults making the best choices available to us in a terrifying situation. Now, parents, teachers, and pediatricians are recognizing the need to bolster the social-emotional skills of children, especially young children, who have been impacted by these lifestyle constraints.

As part of social emotional learning at Hebrew Day School, we work with the Zones of Regulation curriculum. The curriculum was designed by occupational therapist Leah Kuypers to help students gain skills in the area of self-regulation. Self-regulation is defined as the best state of alertness — in both mind and body — for a specific situation. The program uses colorful ‘Zones’ as a child-friendly way to explain the different states of regulation a person might experience. The theory is that self-regulation can be an umbrella over most other social-emotional skills. For example, if a child is experiencing a heated conflict with a peer, a teacher’s first move is always to help the child calm down before trying to mediate. A child who is frustrated, anxious, over-excited, or overwhelmed may have difficulty solving problems or participating in learning activities until they are able to recenter.

Zones of Regulation lessons and activities are designed to help students acknowledge and regulate their emotions. The goal is for students to recognize when they are in each of the different zones and learn to use strategies to change or stay in zones. In addition to gaining self-regulation skills, students practice reading other people’s emotions, exploring how others might react to their behavior, identifying things that trigger them to experience certain feelings, and practicing solving problems. Children hear the important message that no zone is ‘bad’ or ‘naughty’, but sometimes a person is in a zone that doesn’t match the expectations of a given situation, so they may need to use strategies to change zones. It is normal and expected that everyone will find themselves in each of the different zones at one time or another.

It is extremely fulfilling to watch children practicing the important skills of social emotional learning. Our students are catching on quickly, dipping their toes into independent problem solving, experimenting with different social roles, and becoming more adept at naming their many emotions. The resilience of children and their ability to adapt is a remarkable, energizing, universal phenomenon. At least three times this school year, I’ve noticed kids talking together and fleetingly wondered if they were communicating using American Sign Language because of their frequent gesturing. Each time, I found that they were simply talking. My hunch kids are using more gestures to accentuate their speech to compensate for their expressions being hidden by masks. Impressive problem solving.

Lior Project hosts youth mental health first aid training
Jacob Singer, special to the WIN

On March 6, the Lior Project — a community initiative coordinated by Jewish Family Services (JFS) of Washtenaw County — hosted a Youth Men- tal Health First Aid training for Jewish communal professionals. Hebrew Day School, staff and directors of religious schools at Washtenaw congregations, those who facilitate local camps and afterschool programs, and others who provide direct services to youth have been invited to receive this training at no cost to them or their organization.

Youth Mental Health First Aid teaches individuals how to identify, understand, and respond to signs of mental illness and substance use disorders. This training, presented by JFS’s partner, Jewish Family Service of Metro Detroit, teaches adults who live and work with youth the skills they need to reach out and provide initial support to children and adolescents who may be developing a mental health or substance use problem and help connect them to the appropriate care. The course teaches participants the risk factors and warning signs of a variety of mental health challenges common among youth, including depression, anxiety, psychosis, eating disorders, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD), disruptive behavior disorders, and substance use disorders. Participants do not learn to diagnose, nor how to provide any therapy or counseling; rather, participants learn to support a youth who is developing signs and symptoms of a mental illness — or in an emotional crisis — by applying a core five-step action plan: assess for risk of suicide or harm, listen nonjudgmentally, give reassurance and information, encourage appropriate professional help, and encourage self-help and other support strategies.

In October 2021, the American Academy of Pediatrics, the American Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry, and the Children’s Hospital Association declared a national emergency regarding youth mental health. It is critical that professionals working with Jewish community youth receive resources and education to identify and assist those dealing with a mental health challenge.

The Youth Mental Health First Aid training to be held on March 6 is being planned by JFS of Washtenaw County, the organization that convenes and coordinates the Lior Project. The mission of the Lior Project is to increase awareness of, dialogue about, and support for issues of mental health, addiction, and suicide in the Washtenaw County Jewish community. The Lior Project exists to help reduce stigma, promote inclusivity, and enhance community support. Coordinated by JFS, with participation from many local Jewish organizations, the Lior Project is generously supported by the Jewish Women’s Foundation of Metropolitan Detroit and the Jewish Federation of Greater Ann Ar- bor. For more information on the Lior Project, please visit www.jaanARBor.org/lior.

Jewish Federation opens nominations for board and other positions

By Eileen Freed

The Jewish Federation of Greater Ann Arbor invites community members to express their interest in volunteer leadership positions for 2022–2023. Along with its professional team, Federation volunteers address the most significant issues facing the Jewish community. The Governance Committee of the Federation’s Board seeks to engage people from across the community as committee volunteers, chairs, and board members.

“The ideal Federation volunteers are those that reflect the breadth, depth, and diversity of our Jewish Washtenaw County community including divergent viewpoints, affiliations, non-affiliations, and the like,” says Deeky Alexander, incoming Federation Board President and Governance Committee Chair. “We welcome people with skills in communications, fundraising, community building, allocations, and event planning, and those who seek to further develop experience in these areas. Board members in particular gain a strong perspective on the overall needs of the community and work creatively — both internally and with counterparts in other organizations — to address them.”

The Jewish Federation of Greater Ann Arbor provides and inspires philanthropic leadership and community-building to nurture a strong, engaged, connected, caring, vibrant, and enduring Jewish community locally, in Israel, and around the world. The Federation relies on the generous time of community volunteers to achieve its goals.

“We have gained so much from my involvement with Federation, and I wish to share that experience with as many others who may have interest in our community and are seeking ways to productively channel it,” says current Federation President Randy Milgrom. “We have a diverse and engaged and vibrant board, and I hope not only to strengthen it, but to continue to provide a pipeline for new and young leaders well into an even more secure future for our community.”

The Jewish Federation’s most well-known function is the Annual Community Campaign, which raises crucial, unrestricted funds that our partner organizations need to operate, leaving them free to more fully focus on their missions serving the community. Fundraising beyond the Annual Community Campaign enables organizations to tackle specific challenges, such as improving building security, maintaining staffing during COVID, and addressing social service needs.

In addition to fundraising to meet current needs, the planned giving arm of the Federation, the Jewish Community Foundation, provides donor’s opportunity to endow organizations and programs they love. Through LIFE & LEGACT,” the Foundation is also helping to build a culture of legacy giving across the community.

Federation works to engage the community with programs such as Jewish Young Professionals, Women’s Philanthropy, and Israel programming. Other engagement initiatives include Partnership2Gether, which connects local community members to Israel in Moshav Nahalal, and the Jewish Community Relations Committee, which provides a platform for interaction with other faith, ethnic, and civic communities in Washtenaw County, and provides an opportunity to be present and to represent the Jewish community in broader communal issues.

From its unique position, the Jewish Federation convenes the community around issues of importance to nurture a strong communal infrastructure. This includes addressing communal security needs, fostering a welcoming and inclusive environment for people of all abilities and backgrounds, and coordinating community planning, including an upcoming community study.

Serving as a Federation volunteer means giving a few hours of your time on a regular basis to strengthen and enrich Jewish life locally and around the world. It is an opportunity to learn and grow as a leader and to have one’s voice heard in shaping community for the next generation.

Individuals interested in serving on a committee or on the Federation Board of Directors should contact Eileen Freed at 734-773-3537 or eileenfreed@jewishannarbor.org. For more information about Federation, visit www.jewishannarbor.org.
Their wedding guests helped craft their huppah and ketubah – a creative COVID union they’ll never forget

Alix Wall, originally for the JTA

J ulie Plaut Warwick and Ben Schreiber faced the same dilemma as many other couples planning a wedding during the pandemic: How to create a feeling of togetherness when guests may not feel safe attending? Many couples were faced with the decision to create a huppah or ketubah whose design incorporated blessings from their friends and wedding guests.

Plaut Warwick, originally for the JTA

“We wanted to be surrounded by our family and friends and have their blessings, as we had no idea who would actually come,” said Plaut Warwick, of Issaquah, Washington. The “Jewish creatives” they tasked to help them had ideas. And collaboratively, they figured out a way for the couple to be surrounded by the blessings of those important to them, whether they were there physically or not.

Invited guests were instructed to write down their blessings for the couple. A wedding co-officiant then collected the blessings and hung them from the poles of the huppah, the traditional Jewish wedding canopy, while the themes from those blessings were then inscribed on the border of the couple’s ketubah, or marriage contract. They were also chanted by all the guests during their ceremony.

The couple had some idea of what was in store for them — but they didn’t know everything.

“The news about the ketubah and a song coordinated with our huppah blessings trickled down to us slowly,” said Schreiber. “By the time we saw and heard the song, we knew it was happening, but it was like a step-by-step leak.”

Plaut Warwick, 56, is a laughter yoga instructor, mental health professional and Jewish educator. Divorced since 2006 and the mother of two adult children, she thought she would never again marry.

“The couple joined the Zoom session to greet everyone, and then left. Then, inspiration struck Judelsohn: “While we were creating the blessings with Nancy, I saw the blessings around the ketubah,” she said. “In my original design, it was going to be a floral or leaf pattern.” Instead, Judelsohn decided to incorporate themes from the huppah blessings into the design of the ketubah.

“I started by pulling out the words that were used the most,” said Judelsohn, who is mostly known for her painting on silk. “It’s how words like “joy” and “laughter” ended up along the ketubah’s borders.

Meanwhile, since Eiseman, who is a songleader and Jewish educator, was co-officiate the wedding with Kol Ami’s Rabbi Yoehanna Kinberg, she began thinking what her unique contribution could be.

The end result, in which Kinberg and the wedding guests sang their blessings collectively, was “less a song than a ‘sound bath’ using the words everyone had offered,” she said. “This was not just me singing to them, but we engaged everyone in the singing.”

The wedding took place October 10 at the Woodmark Hotel in Kirkland, Washington, in front of approximately 100 guests, all of whom had been tested for COVID-19.

“A lot of it was meant to be tongue and cheek because COVID has just robbed people of their joy,” said Plaut Warwick, explaining why the wedding party consisted of two 50-something women, dubbed “lowlucks,” who threw petals from felt jack-o-lanterns and groomsmen called “Ring Security Dudes” who carried lockboxes for the rings.

As for the huppah and ketubah? They are now both displayed next to each other in their home.

“They just make me smile every time I walk by them,” said Plaut Warwick, who has since taken the name Schreiber. “They are both so colorful and meaningful. When we buy a house, we need one with large walls.”

Ben and Julie Schreiber were married Oct. 10, 2021, in Kirkland, Wash., under a huppah whose design incorporated blessings from their friends and wedding guests.

Moving Traditions at TBE

Throughout this school year, Temple Beth Emeth has expanded how they prepare their families for the Bar and Bat Mitzvah journey, or, as Moving Traditions calls it, the “B-Mitzvah” journey. Moving Traditions is a Jewish educational organization seeking to transform Jewish teen education at the national level. From their website, www.movingtraditions.org, “Moving Traditions connects the issues preteens and teens care about most — such as body image, social and academic pressure, friendship, romance, and sexuality — to enduring Jewish values, fosters positive peer-to-peer relationships through our trained educators and mentors, and inspires participants to develop an ongoing connection to Jewish community. By promoting a more inclusive and expansive view of gender for Jewish girls, boys, and transgender and nonbinary teens, we create a more vibrant, engaging Judaism that helps all teens to flourish.”

At Temple Beth Emeth, this connection takes form through a series of curated programs for its sixth and seventh graders and their families. “All the Moving Traditions programs, both those for families and those just for the students, broaden the conversation of what it means to become Bat or Bar Mitzvah,” said Rabbi Daniel Alter, TBE’s Director of Education. “Each session focuses on a different aspect, be it growing up, parent-child relationships, gender identity, dealing with antisemitism, and more.”

The Moving Traditions B-Mitzvah curriculum incorporates two different formats. One piece focuses solely on sixth and seventh grade students and is designed to take place during regular Religious School sessions throughout the year. The other component brings students and their parents together, where they engage in both combined (students and parents together) and parallel (in which students and parents engage in similar topics separately) learning. At TBE this year, these family focused sessions occur on Saturday afternoons and conclude with havdalah.

“Gathering our sixth and seventh grade families over the course of this year has added a depth of community we only could have with in-person gathering,” said Rabbi Josh, TBE’s Senior Rabbi. “We’ve learned together, we’ve shared our excitement and our worries. We’ve become proximate even in the face of this pandemic. Our Moving Traditions gatherings have helped build a sense of cohesiveness even in trying times.”

Each session plays out a little differently. One session with sixth graders and their families began with a “human barometer.” One side of the room was designated “agree; the other, “disagree.” After hearing a prompt, such as “This is the first b-mitzvah in our family,” participants move themselves on the scale to share their response. Another activity actualized a conversation of juggling teen and adult responsibilities by literally labeling balloons with responsibilities and challenging students to keep them all aloft as long as possible! Every session provides great opportunities for parents and students to learn with each other, from each other, and to share their thoughts with one another.

Integrating Moving Traditions into their youth education program represents TBE’s latest expansion of their Bat and Bar Mitzvah experience. “Becoming Bar or Bat Mitzvah is far more than simply leading a service or reading Torah,” explained Rabbi Alter. “The ritual is of course important, but we also recognize a Bat and Bar Mitzvah celebration as a singular moment in our students’ evolution from childhood to adulthood. As our students grow into the awkward and amazing years between ages 12 and 20, their families and their communities grow as well. We want to support, encourage, and do our best to prepare our families for and during these changes. Moving Traditions offers a structure to do that.”

TBE’s Cantor Regina Hayut expanded on this idea. “We recognize that becoming Bar or Bat Mitzvah is a deeply emotional time in a family’s life cycle. It is exciting but it is also daunting,” she explained. “Moving Traditions has offered a great opportunity to open conversations with our students and their parents about so many challenging issues that emerge at this juncture in life. Moving into adolescence and growing up is difficult and can feel lonely for both children as well as parents. Coming together as a community to grapple with these issues has been a powerful opportunity for our TBE families. I wish there was a program like this when my children were preparing for their B’nai Mitzvah experiences!”

Amalek: From before Sinai until today

Physical world and the joy of the spiritual world. They had to plant, sow and grow crops. In the physical world, they had to get involved with G-d. That's the first stage. The second stage was when they left Egypt and just entered into the desert; second, when they were just leaving the desert and entering the land of Israel; third, just after entering the land of Israel and getting settled; and fourth, finishing up the job even to this day until the coming of the Moshiach. So that's how we see the parallel between these encounters that Amalek had with the Jewish people.

Another observation we can make is the difference between the first and third stages. When, in the first stage, in the desert, Amalek encountered the Jews in a revealed, undisguised manner: his identity was clear. Similarly, in the third stage, when they were settling into the land of Israel — that also was having Amalek undisguised and revealed. However, in the second stage when the Jews were leaving the desert, the Amalekim came with their identity disguised as Canaanites. That's similar to our current times which is a second stage of leaving exile and entering redemption by greeting Moshiach that we are going to be faced with Amalek in a disguised form. He's going to pretend that he is something different from what he actually is in order to entrap the Jewish people.

According to the Chassidic interpretation, this Amalek that we are talking about is manifested not only as a physical person, but as a "miniature Amalek" within everyone's own psyches that attempts to distance us from G-d. For example, the Torah uses language that implies that Amalek caused the Jewish people to 'cool down' their enthusiasm for G-d and Torah and mitzvos. Similarly, today, we have our own "little Amalek" that tries to cool us down from our commitment to G-d and our attempts to try to get closer to G-d. We must be aware of this disguised Amalek who is trying to distance us from G-d.

The Amalek tries to use all different logical arguments to distance a person from G-d. Like we said previously, he disguised himself as a Canaanite. The word Canaanite also has a meaning of a 'businessperson.' He tries to be dishonest when doing his "business" and he claims that any success that he has comes from his own strength and not from G-d.

So therefore, once a year, we read in the Torah about the Amalek in order to recognize our own little Amalek that we have — in order not to fall prey to it. On the contrary, to strengthen ourselves in our service to G-d — and for sure G-d will give us the ability — just like the Jewish people weakened Amalek in the desert — that's why we should also weaken our "little Amalek" and do what G-d wants us to do.

A Unique Yiddish Megile

By Shifra Epstein

Between World Wars I and II, printing of the biblical Book of Esther — called Megillat Esther in Hebrew and Megillas Ester in Yiddish — flourished in the United States. These publications ranged from simple paper booklets to illuminated and illustrated scrolls. The megillah pictured above, completed in 1936, uses the Yiddish translation of the Book of Esther done by the well-known Yiddish poet and Bible translator Yehoash (Solomon Blumgarten). The megillah is written and illuminated for a Yiddish service in Chicago by Yitzhak Chaya (Chaya) Yehoash Blumgarten. Chaya (Chaya) Yehoash Blumgarten caligraphed the entire megile in Hebrew script, combining modern and faux-archaic fonts to create a style reminiscent of ancient Hebrew script.

The Yehoash megile is completely unique in the history of megillot published in the United States; it is the only known megile scroll printed in Yiddish. The Yehoash megile follows the traditional design of a Hebrew illuminated scroll. Each of the book's ten chapters begins with an enlarged letter set within an embellished rectangular frame.

The inaugural Houdini performance at 2 p.m. on Sunday, March 20, at EMU’s Sponberg Theatre will be preceded at 11 a.m. by a forum that brings together three engaging experts: the poet and founder of Paris Press, Jan Freeman; the poet and Rukeyser scholar Stefania Heim; and University of Michigan Professor of Film, Television, and Media, Matthew Solomon. Those interested in gaining deeper understanding of Rukeyser’s fascination with Houdini are invited to register for this forum. You can find the registration link at http://murielrukeyser.emuenglish.org.

The second performance, at Riverside Arts Center on Thursday, March 24, at 7 p.m. is designed to appeal to a younger audience and to the magic of poetry. It conjures up Rukeyser’s imagination, as well as to encourage their response. In collaboration with YpsiWrites, a writing-focused nonprofit organization serving the Ypsilanti area, we invite local youth to submit poems for a Poetry Wall displayed at Riverside Arts Center prior to the performance. The poetry submission form as well as teacher and student guides to Rukeyser and Houdini are available on the YpsiWrites website (https://www.ypsiwrites.com/) and at https://shmitaproject.org/submissions/renewing-shmita/.

On March 26 and 27, will take place at Detroit’s Matrix Theatre, a community theater dedicated to the creation and production of original plays and education in play writing, performance, and puppetry for people of all ages.

Under the direction of EMU Theatre Professor Lee Stille, the talented actors of EMU’s Theatre Program will bring the musical to life in each of four staged readings. Using scripts, and relying on language, movement, and the audience’s imagination, the performers will conjure up Rukeyser’s magical telling of Houdini’s story.

We thank Michigan Humanities (an affiliate of the National Endowment of the Humanities), EMU’s Center for Jewish Studies, and the EMU English Department for their generous support of these events. For more information, please contact EMU Professor of English Elisabeth Dauher at edauher@emich.edu.

Lucia Ruedenberg living on the Community Farm

Our call was charmingly punctuated with a cuckoo-clock alarm, the chirps and squawks of pet birds, and periodic interruptions from kids in the house, as I sat down to talk to community member Lucia Ruedenberg about her life in Ann Arbor, her involvement with one of the oldest CSAs in the country (that also has deep connections to the Jewish community in the area), and the ways her Judaism informs and ties into her life philosophy.

Lucia moved to the Ann Arbor area in 2018 from Pittsburgh, having prior to that been a New York City resident for 30 years. She grew up in Ames, Iowa. Her Pittsburgh Jewish community, Dor Hadash, was one of the congregations hit in Squirrel Hill in the Tree of Life shooting. When she and her family came to Ann Arbor, they looked up Reconstructionist congregations in the area and attended infrequently. Lucia decided to officially join the Ann Arbor Reconstructionist Congregation (AARC) this past year.

During their move, Lucia and her husband reached out through a connection via the contra dance community, which they were active in back in Pittsburgh and wanted to be involved in here too. They connected with Nancy and Drake Meadow, who are also AARC members. They saw the listing for a house on a farm in the area, which turned out to be the teaching farm for the Rudolf Steiner school in Ann Arbor. Lucia said she and her husband had “had a home-steeped in a previous life and wanted to be back in connection with some kind of farming.” The farm in question, Community Farm of Ann Arbor, is one of the first CSAs in the country and the first in Michigan, founded in 1988 with biodynamic principles (biodynamics is the philosophy that helped spawn the modern organic movement). Lucia and her partner and community lives nearby.

Community Farm has a strong focus on the “community” aspect: if you want, you can pay your dues and pick up your vegetables and leaf, but many members go further. There are “weed and sing” events as well as opportunities for families to bring children who can explore the farm, play, and learn where their food comes from. Members are encouraged to bring their own skills: one member with expertise in solar energy has converted many of the farm’s buildings and one of the tractors to run on solar, and another member runs the bee hives. Last year the farm put on a fundraiser event to raise money for new roofs for the barns, with live music, contra dancing, and outdoor lectures on the history of barns, sustainable farming, and ecology.

Helping run one of the longest-running CSAs in the country isn’t easy. Lucia says: “The economics of sustainable farming are very hard … it requires a group effort.” Most small farms stay afloat because they are a multi-generational undertaking, the land is inherited, and often one or more household members work outside the farm. Community Farm is exploring ways to sustain their members work outside the farm, including new roofs for the barns, with live music, contra dancing, and outdoor lectures on the history of barns, sustainable farming, and ecology.

Community Farm member. “I sit at the crossroads of ordinary, daily life, with its tasks and responsibilities, especially in how they impact food and community.”

It’s hard, when you’re young, to imagine answering questions about the arc of your life and constructing a coherent narrative from it, pulling together the threads of your life that you plan about. She discussed her mixed heritage influences growing up with her German Jewish scientist father and her Swiss Protestant puppeteer mother, straddling the worlds of Christianity and Judaism, academia and art, and learning to combine the two in her career, where she has been a writer and an academic, and now makes natural, Waldorf-inspired toys for Palumba, a local business owned by a long-term Community Farm member. “I sit at the crossroads of different cultures … I think that at their core art and science come from the same source, are different expressions of the same energy, just a different way of looking at and expressing and understanding the world.”

Living on the Community Farm, too, allows her to bring together different parts of herself: working with her hands, committing to biodynamic principles, being in touch with the sources of one’s food, connecting to Jews in community, and raising a new generation with deep ties to the land.

She says she’s been able to look back on her life and see the different stages she went through across the decades: “The 20s were an incredible time of experimenting and trying new things, the 30s were real hard work years … and by the time you hit 40 you can say, ‘I think I know what I want’ … you don’t have to try everything anymore. By the time you hit 50, you really get a lot of clarity. It kind of all starts at 50.” She compares her journey through life to that of Rebecca Solnit, whose book, Recollections of My Nonexistence, she’s been reading. Solnit “always seemed to know she wanted to be a writer, but it took her forever to become one. She took a lot of winding paths.”

Lucia looks forward to deepening her involvement with AARC in the new year, perhaps by hosting congregation events on the farm: putting up a sukkah, hosting Shabbat, or other celebrations. The pandemic, and the death of her husband in mid-2020, forced her and her two teenage daughters to reconfigure many elements of their life, and her “relationship to everything has changed profoundly in many ways.” But, as with all of us, she’s looking forward to things getting better. She talked about her time working on a kibbutz in Israel in her 30s, talking to survivors from WWII there: “They said the reason Jews have survived this long was because they were motivated, they were so committed and motivated to survive. That’s what I feel, that kind of tenacity and motivation to survive, but also to thrive and to do good.”

Israel is Growing ... All the way to space!

By Ron Harel, Shrinshine (Israeli emissary) to the greater Ann Arbor and Metro Detroit Jewish communities through a teen gap year program from the Jewish Agency for Israel (IAFI). Ron and her cohort of four high school graduates arrived in Michigan in August 2021. The Shrinshine program is a partnership between IAFI and the Jewish Federations of Greater Ann Arbor and of Metropolitan Detroit.

I’d like you to think about how big the universe is, and how small Israel is compared to it. Yet that tiny country in the Middle East, 450 times smaller than the United States, found itself on a list of countries that are leading the world’s space industry; more specifically, Israel is now the seventh country ever to cross the boundaries of our planet into space.

This March, Eitan Stiva, a former Israeli combat pilot in the Israel Defense Forces, will be the second Israelis to go into space. On January 13 of this year, eight space satellites built by Israeli middle school students were launched into space. From eighth graders in Israel straight to NASA’s launch site in Florida. It sounds amazing, and it is. But did you know that one of Israel’s current missions in space originated with a young Israeli boy… Genesis? Genesis is the name of the first Israeli spacecraft that made it all the way to the moon.

Genesis’ story begins more than eight years ago with three Israeli engineers and a crazy decision — “overly ambitious” as engineer Kfir Damari said — to respond to a huge challenge: enter the Google Space Competition to launch the smallest spacecraft in history to the moon. Until Israel entered the competition, only the biggest countries in the world had dared to try. Many doubted Israel’s attempt would be successful, but the Israelis knew that just because you don’t have the necessary knowledge or the right resources from the start, ambition and chutzpah will get you where you want to go. And so, those three engineers who decided to do something no one had done before — a truly Israeli act — founded SpacEL1, a company whose goal was to bring Israel to the moon. They worked on the project for over eight years until the exciting day when Genesis was launched into space, on February 21, 2019.

How did it go? Just under two months after it launched, on April 11, Genesis failed to land. It crashed into the moon’s surface. I happened to be attending a start-up conference at the time, as part of the MEET program, a three-year entrepreneurship, leadership, and technology institute for Israeli and Palestinian teens. On that April day in 2019, my teammates and I were in the midst of a hectic and exhausting 48 hours of sleepless development work on my BARK startup idea — an adoption platform for dogs in danger of being euthanized.

Although we were deep in work, Genesis was a big deal, and we couldn’t stop watching as it crashed on the moon. It was heartbreaking! All that work… and so close. …

The “space industry” symbolizes a lot for me in terms of growth; entrepreneurship has always been an integral part of my life, from selling cookies in front of my house to my first start-up. It is like that for every Israeli teenager, for every person, with a creative idea striving to bring it to life. But even though it crashed, Genesis still actually landed on the moon. And it was in that moment that I understood what it means to be Jewish so far.

We are not afraid to take risks, or even crash, because we’ve known a lot of failures over our short time. What carries us forward is that we can see always new growth, even from the failures, and move ahead towards the next challenge.

The spaceship Genesis reminded me that the story of Israelis and Jewish growth begins with the biblical Genesis. Our growth begins with our roots, the challenges we’ve endured throughout history and how we grew from them. These challenges made us realize that no matter how small we are in relation to the world, or compared to other countries, out there in space the rules are different. Time after time, Israel proves to the world that the sky is just not our limit.

Three years and one month after the first Israeli spacecraft almost landed on the moon, Eitan Stiva will be the second Israeli to go into space, with 35 Israeli scientific experiments on board. He will continue the journey started by Ilan Ramon, the first Israeli to go to space on the shuttle Columbia, whose entry back to earth, on February 1, 2003, tragically ended in flames as the world watched.

Still, Israel continues to send satellites into space as a world leader in space exploration, collaborating with the innovation-laden Israeli Space Week this past January. Meanwhile, SpaceIL is working on the Genesis 2 project… because who doesn’t love a second season?

Onward with our growth, we will never give up.}

Ann Arbor student experiences ‘Muss Magic’ in semester abroad program

When Greenhills Upper School moved to online classes during the pandemic, Ryder Fried, now a 17-year-old senior there, immediately began looking for alternatives. “My family and I started looking for in-person learning opportunities,” he said. What he found would send him across the world for a life-changing experience.

Instead of attending online classes, Ryder spent a fall semester at Alexander Muss High School in Israel (Muss), Jewish National Fund-USA’s (JNF-USA) flagship study abroad program in Israel. “It was one of the best three-month experiences of my life,” he said. With five Michigan students spending either a semester or a summer program in Israel at Muss within the last two years, the study abroad experience has recently gained a lot of traction within the Michigan Jewish community. With a unique educational experience that blends traditional high school classes with experiential learning that uses the land of Israel as a living and breathing classroom, Muss gives students an unforgettable experience they can take with them when they return home.

For Ryder, one memory in particular that stuck with him was the day he climbed the ancient Jewish fortress of Masada with his class. “Masada was a particularly special day,” he said. “Before we went, we learned the history of Masada, which made the climb up all the more impactful.”

“What Muss does with their studies is extremely impressive,” said Sunny Nayberg, JNF-USA Israel Programs Admissions Director, Midwest. “Students remain on track to finish high school on time thanks to Muss’ focus on academic excellence, while also experiencing Israel’s history for themselves and strengthening their bond with the Jewish homeland.”

Ryder also fondly recalls all of the people he met at Muss. “I came to Israel not knowing anyone and left with 60 new friends,” he said. “I think connecting anyone else at the start was a blessing because it motivated me to hang out with new individuals that would soon become my best friends.”

After Ryder finished his semester abroad, he returned home with a newfound motivation to be an active member of his Jewish community, noting that while his Judaism was always a major part of his identity, he was never particularly involved in the community.

“I have always considered Judaism to be a major factor in my life. My family celebrates all the holidays, including Shabbat each Friday night, and I attended Jewish Day School for years,” he said. “However, I didn’t (and still don’t) attend temple very often, so I wouldn’t say that I was that engaged with my local Jewish community.”

However, after Ryder returned home, he reached out to the Ann Arbor Jewish Federation and started tutoring English for students in Israel. He also worked with several Israeli students from Moshav Nahalal, the Jewish Federation's Israel exchange student program. “I helped them with English, which was cool because I got to use my Hebrew that I learned at Muss!”

“We call it the ‘Muss Magic,’” said Nayberg. “Students who come back from Muss are far more likely to be engaged in the Jewish community, growing up to be activists on their college campuses and leaders in their community.”

When asked if he would recommend the program to other high school students, Ryder emphatically said he would. “I would encourage all high school students to spend a semester in Israel,” he said. “My main piece of advice for students coming to Israel would be to step outside their comfort zone and try to get to know everyone. During my semester, all the students were fun. There were some kids that I only really got to know towards the end of the program, but we were able to get close.”

In the meantime, Ryder has been focused on college applications, and plans on involving himself in Jewish life once on campus. In addition, he looks forward to his next trip to Israel where he can revisit some of the iconic sites that he visited during his time at Muss.

Alexander Muss High School in Israel offers both semesters abroad in Israel and summer programs. For more information, go to ambius.org or contact Sunny Nayberg at snayberg@jnf.org.
People Love Dead Jews author stirs lively crowd at Federation’s Main Event

by Federation Staff

With more than 100 people convening in person under strict COVID protocols — and nearly 300 more in attendance by Zoom — author Dara Horn and Marty Shichtman, Eastern Michigan University’s Professor of English and Director of its Center for Jewish Studies, engaged in a compelling conversation at the Jewish Federation of Greater Ann Arbor’s Main Event held on the evening of February 9.

Horn is the award-winning author of six books, including her most recent — her first work of nonfiction, People Love Dead Jews: Reports from a Haunted Present. Horn has a doctorate in comparative literature from Harvard University and is a popular lecturer for audiences around the world. So, when this pair of scholars sat down in matching armchairs on a stage prepared for a heart-to-heart chat, the audience was immediately in thrall of these smart, engaged, and passionate people conversing in a friendly yet urgent way about some of the most pressing issues of the day.

The Main Event was held in the ballroom of Ann Arbor’s Kensington Hotel, and the evening’s program was co-chaired by Federation’s immediate past president Steven Aronson and his wife Levana — along with community members Ben and Monica Rosen, whom Mr. Aronson referred to in his remarks as representative of our “next generation of leaders.”

“This is pretty much my first large indoor gathering since Omicron hit,” Federation President Randy Milgrom told the crowd during his opening remarks. “And I cannot tell you what a pleasure it has been to finally see — and to schmooze with — so many of you in person this evening. More than a hundred of you, which is quite a few more than we had initially expected! So perhaps tonight we had initially expected! So perhaps tonight we had "been trying all her life not to write." But if "you’re really curious about us" you’ll find out that "People tell stories about dead Jews that make them feel better about themselves. Usually they require the erasure of actual Jews in order to tell that story. We feel sad, but great about ourselves. We all look great compared with Nazis."

Horn noted that much of the popular Holocaust literature and remembrances focus on stories of “people like us,” the assimilated. At the Holocaust Museum’s “Daniel’s Story” exhibit, for example, in this young German, Yiddish-speaking boy’s room, there are his soccer trophies and his father’s war medals — but where are his religious texts, or his father’s treadmill, or tickets to the Yiddish Theatre? According to Horn, “is the actual culture that was destroyed in the Holocaust.”

And the reason for this erasure is that anti-bignoty education has stressed that “we’re all just like everyone else.” But if “you’re really curious about us” you’ll find out that Jews are different. "Uncloseness is Judaism’s brand," she said.

Shichtman mentioned the protests here for herself. What she discovered, she said, is that, “People tell stories about dead Jews that make them feel better about themselves. Usually they require the erasure of actual Jews in order to tell that story. We feel sad, but great about ourselves. We all look great compared with Nazis.”

Horn’s previous books are all novels, why had she decided to shift gears to write a nonfiction book — and one about dead Jews, no less? Horn, an engaging speaker with an incredibly facile mind, explained, among other reasons, that in some ways this is a book she had “been trying all her life not to write.” People Love Dead Jews — a title which the author says she still can’t believe her publisher let her keep — first took shape in her mind’s eye when she realized that while most people could name four concentration camps, almost no one could name four Yiddish writers.

“Why do you care so much about how they died,” she thought, “if you don’t seem to care at all about how they lived?” And the book became a way to figure that out.

In Ann Arbor at Beth Israel Congregation, and asked her how to deal with that kind of rhetoric. Ms. Horn immediately said, “You call it out.” And she urged that we assert the vitality and complexity of Jewish life, and that we explain it, and stand up for it — against an antisemitism that is decidedly on the rise.

Horn was also incredibly gracious throughout the evening, thanking her hosts for making her feel so welcome in Ann Arbor, and spending time speaking with guests and signing books for anyone who asked — both before the program and well after it was over.

The Main Event is Federation’s premier annual fundraising and community event, which not only celebrates the bonds of partnership and friendship but also helps to raise the financial support necessary to maintain and sustain Jewish organizations locally, nationally, and around the world. There was a brief pause during the evening for those who wished to make an additional pledge or gift to the Jewish Federation of Greater Ann Arbor’s 2022 Annual Community Campaign.

Due to both the pandemic and the alarming rise in antisemitism, Federation is even more focused on and committed to helping those with the greatest needs, and it is asking those who are fortunate enough to be able to do so to please consider giving generously — now, more than ever.

In a survey conducted by Federation a couple of years ago, community members made it clear that those who’ve been in the habit of attending Federation’s Main Event recognize it as their single best chance to enjoy a community-wide celebration with friends and acquaintances. They’ve also fallen in love with and look forward to the Main Event’s schmooze time, which is why more than an hour was devoted to noshing and mingling before the formal program commenced — even for those on Zoom, who kept up a lively discussion of their own in the chat, posting, “Incredible program!!” “Wonderful and thought provoking.” “Wow! Thank you.” “Terrific! I learned a great deal tonight!” And “Awesome, awesome.”

In loving MEMORY of CAROL AMSTER

February 17, 1935 - February 12, 2022

Remembering our beloved, cherished, deeply respected, and truly admired friend and steadfast supporter, Carol Amster z"l.

We reflect on all the great contributions she and her late husband Herb z"l made to Jewish Family Services of Washtenaw County. We are particularly grateful for Carol's decision to commemorate Herb's legacy in creating The Herb Amster Center at JFS. The Center embodies and actualizes advice Herb Amster often gave JFS to bring sustainability to the agency through long-term financial stability. His motto was, "Do good things, but remember the bottom line so you can do more good things."

Building upon the breadth and depth of knowledge and experience within JFS, The Herb Amster Center affords this venerable agency the opportunity to offer clinical, behavioral, transportation, interpretation, training and caregiving expertise to individuals, organizations, and third-party payers that purchase these services — in order to continue serving those in the community who cannot.

A MESSAGE FROM THE JFS BOARD OF DIRECTORS

For the past ten years, Carol embraced the opportunity to continue Herb’s impact on JFS and its clients. She took up the mantle of support, mentorship, and enthusiasm for JFS and The Herb Amster Center. She brought her passion, energy, humor, and experience in both general and Jewish communal service. She inspired us. She became part of the JFS team, for which we are forever grateful. We have lost a precious friend and partner. Carol’s community leadership will continue to be a blessing to us all.

EILEEN FREED, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, JEWISH FEDERATION OF GREATER ANN ARBOR

Carol’s concept of honoring the memory of her beloved husband Herb z"l by putting his words into action is a reflection of the values and qualities that made her such an effective community leader. Compassionate, caring for those on the edges of society, forward-thinking, innovative, devoted – to Herb and to the community. Carol was a woman with high expectations for herself and others whose vision and action will have a lasting impact on JFS’s ability to serve the community for generations to come.

ANYA ABRAMZON CEO, JFS

We are deeply grateful to Carol and her family for giving us the incredible gift to carry on Herb’s name through the transformative work of the entrepreneurial engine of Jewish Family Services—The Herb Amster Center. For the last ten years, Carol had been a key member of the Amster Center’s think tank and its biggest cheerleader. Her excitement, enthusiasm, unwavering support, and endless generosity gave us strength and instilled confidence when we needed it most. We are profoundly grateful for the legacy she leaves behind and will miss her dearly.
It was entrepreneur Herb Amster that planted the seed for JFS to take advantage of its services to generate earned revenue as a way to reduce the Agency’s dependency on foundation grants. Carol enabled the work and blessed the use of Herb’s name to be associated with the endeavor referred to as the Amster Center. JFS annual earned revenue when the Amster Center was started about ten years ago was less than $10,000. In 2021, earned revenue approximated $461,000, about 8% of the operating budget. Much of it is derived from the Thrive Counseling services. The Amsters’ comfort with new initiatives in support of addressing the needs of the JFS clients is unique. They leave a legacy that will only continue to grow over the years – we’ve been blessed with their trust and long-term support.

Carol Amster has described JFS “as a place of permanent legacy for my husband Herb of blessed memory.” What has taken place within JFS—a nonprofit, social service agency—since the creation of The Herb Amster Center can be described as nothing less than a massive culture shift. That shift, that energy, that push, that constant focus on the quality of services and the business of the services is due to Carol Amster and HER spirit, her tenacity, her focus that created this LIVING memorial. Carol’s BEING made us smarter, stronger and more sustainable.

To see the smiles on their faces when you give...to see how happy people are...that’s the legacy.
Todd Gitlin, leftist Jewish writer with strong attachment to Israel, dies at 79

Ron Kampeas, originally for the TTA

Todd Gitlin became the archetype of the 1960s radical not just by leading protests against the Vietnam War and apartheid, but by questioning the movements he helped found.

The prophet-in-his-own-land persona Gitlin fashioned for himself, alienating to a degree his cohort from his campus days, extended to his Jewish profile. He rebuked fellow leftists for their bids to make Israel a pariah, while remaining a fierce critic of Israel's occupation.

Gitlin died February 5 in Pittsfield, Massachusetts, at age 79. He had been hospitalized in December after a massive heart attack and had suffered renal failure.

Gitlin was just 20 in 1963 when he served as president of Students for a Democratic Society, the group that would throughout the rest of the decade spearhead student protests against the Vietnam War and South African apartheid and for civil rights at home.

At that age, Gitlin, born and raised in New York City, had already graduated from Harvard and was getting his master's degree in political science from the University of Michigan; he went on to get a doctorate from the University of California, Berkeley. When he died, he was a professor at Columbia University.

He once said he did not plan a career outside of radicalism, but he settled into a chronicler of a time that had shaped his country. His best-known work, The Sixties: Years of Hope, Days of Rage, was published in 1987, but it was a line in another book published in 1995, The Twilight of Common Dreams: Why America Is Wrecked by Culture War that best came to define him: "While the right has been busy taking the White House, the left has been marching on the English department."

His point was that the left had become obsessed with identity and was not focused enough on the inequities that had under-scored the dreams of revolution in the 1960s. "His legacy was that you could do re-search in a way that was not an ivory tower, you could help people understand the power and structure of the country you were living in and do something about it," said Rabbi Arthur Waskow, the founder of the Shalom Center in Philadelphia, who had known Gitlin since their days in Students for Demo-cratic Society.

Gitlin cast a jaundiced eye on the media, arguing that it bound Americans to the illu-sions a corporate state foisted upon them. "Ozzi and Harriet is a lie," he said of the 1950s TV show that became a template for situation comedy. In the same 1989 interview with the New York Times, he recalled sitting in a theater cringing watching The Big Chill, the hit 1983 movie that commodified and sanitized the experience of his generation, while everyone around him loved it.

The corrosive effects of the media culmi-nated for him in the election to the presiden-cy of a reality TV star, and he found himself joining in what might have once been un-thinkable alliances in seeking to undo the legacy of Donald Trump.

Gitlin joined an Anti-Defamation League task force in 2016 to examine the death threats endured by journalists who covered Trump's election that year. Last year he and Bill Kristol, a Republican who soured on Trump but remains conservative in his out-look, spearheaded an open letter by liber-als and conservatives warning of the threat Trump continued to pose to democracy.

"Todd was a witty, kind and shrewd co-conspirator," Kristol said on Twitter.

Waskow said Gitlin's allergy to iden-tity politics extended to the Freedom Seder Waskow wrote after the 1968 assassination of Martin Luther King Jr. and debuted at a civil rights seder in 1969 — a seder that has become a symbol in the Jewish social justice movement.

"He misunderstood it," Waskow said. "He thought it would contribute to distracting people from the big picture of what needed to be changed in American society. He thought it was a way of drawing people into concern with their Jewishness to the detri-ment of their concern with what he saw as major American issues, structural issues in American society."

Yet Gitlin found himself drawn to his Jew-ish identity, particularly as it was expressed through an affinity for Israel.

At a symposium organized in 2011 by the magazine Dissent, he vividly depicted how conflicted he was about the Jewish state.

"In the world I was born into, Israel was an emotion wrapped in an idea," Gitlin said. "Simply by existing, the Jewish state was a portal to deliverance, and since I had been carried through that portal at birth, so to speak, a sense of deliverance was my default emotion."

Describing an upbringing in which sing-ing "Hatikvah," the Israeli national anthem, was "far more vivid and rapturous" than "The Star-Spangled Banner," he said he remained emotionally invested in Israel.

"In 1973, news that Egyptian forces had crossed the Suez Canal sent me in tears to a San Francisco shul I had never set foot in before, knowing acutely, desperately, that if the state of Israel was going to be destroyed, I wanted to receive the news among Jews," he said. "In 1975, driving in San Francisco, when I heard on the radio about the U.N. General Assembly passing the infamous 'Zionism = racism' resolution, written in Orwellian duckspeak, I swore out loud my revulsion that in a world of nations, all of which are founded on mythic ideas with various downsides, one, in particular, should have been singled out for condemnation. I puffed myself up to declare that Israel wasn't going to be destroyed: Over my dead body."

The very affinity he felt for Israel made him despair when, he said, it was terrorizing Palestinian civilians.

Today, the state of Israel feels to me like a personal trauma, a huge, heartbreaking dis-appointment, a world-historical opportunity foregone, a danger to the Jews, a burden — and also a nation to which, like it or not, I am fastened, where people I love and admire carry on an immensely, grievously difficult struggle for decency against tall odds."

For the next decade, Gitlin inhabited a space between damning Israel's occupa-tion and defending its existence: In 2014, he joined a collective call condemning boycotts of Israeli academics; in 2016 he joined a col-lective call for boycotts of settlement goods.

Gitlin was a gregarious writer, enveloping his targets in affection even as he lacerated what he believed were their lapses of critical thinking. In November, he took to The For ward to blast Sally Rooney, the millennial Irish novelist who would not allow her work to be published in Israel.

"No contemporary writer has gotten un-der my skin as you have," he began, saying he was "astonished" by her facility for dialogue and for making vivid "the damages of class."

He said as appalled as he was by Israel's oc-cupation, he could not support her boycott. "The freedom of literature is the enemy of the locked-up mind," he wrote. "Your own work is a splendid tribute to the spirit that strives to think its way out of prisons and gropes its way toward a more beautiful world."

He was appalled, his friend Jo-Ann Mort said, at likening Israel's practices to South African Apartheid, as someone who had led protests against the system of racial segrega-tion in the 1960s.

"He said there are two competing rights" to the land in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, "so BDS doesn't make any sense," Mort said in an interview, referring to the movement to boycott, divest from and sanction Israel.

Mort, a communications adviser to an array of groups and movements on the left, paid tribute to Gitlin in a Facebook post, writing, "In my little world of left-wing Zion-ism he was an important voice of steadfastness and honesty."

Mort said in the interview that Gitlin would be sorely missed among those on the American left who are attached to Israel.

"The loss is real, in terms of someone who had that stature as a public intellectual, there are not a lot of people left like that," she said.

Gitlin is survived by his third wife, Lau-reln Ann Cook; a sister, Judy Gitlin; and three stepchildren.

Eggplant and Feta Salad

The Jewish Kitchen by Clarissa Hyman

Serves 4

This is a simple super dish that is served with pasta. Eggplant, feta cheese, and vegetables are the main ingredients in this dish. Eggplant is a good source of fiber and can help lower cholesterol levels. Feta cheese is a type of goat cheese that is high in protein and low in calories. Vegetables provide vitamins and minerals that can help maintain good health.

Ingredients:
- 1 small, finely diced onion
- 4 to 6 garlic cloves, sliced
- 2 lb green beans — use kale, chard, collards, or a combination (remove the tough stems)
- 1 cup chopped parsley
- 1 lemon
- Salt and pepper to taste

Directions:
1. Heat some olive oil in a large non-stick pan and add the finely diced onions. Sweat the onions and garlic for about 1 minute. No need to add water as they will still be moist.
2. Add the sliced green beans and stir-fry them until they are tender. Stir in the chopped parsley and season with salt and pepper.
3. Serve hot on top of pasta or as a side dish.
The Great Resignation is fueling a rabbinic hiring crisis
Asaf Shalev, originally for the JTA

I n early December, Judaism’s Conservative movement sent a disquieting mesgage to dozens of synagogues looking for a new rabbi: Many of you won’t make a hire this year.

At least 80 Conservative synagogues anticipated — five moves: the rabbis association, and United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, the group that represents its nearly 600 congregations.

That email outlined a number of strategies that synagogues, rabbis applicants and movement organizations could adopt to mitigate the challenging job market. But last week, a new message indicated strongly that the mismatch remains acute.

Starting Feb. 1, the new letter said, the Conservative movement is suspending many of the rules that are meant to ensure that Conservative synagogues hire only rabbis trained at the movement’s seminaries or who have otherwise applied for and won admission to the Rabbinical Assembly.

Those rules are relaxed late in the hiring season in a typical year, but the accelerated timeline represents a concession that the movement, which has been shrinking for decades, is not fully situated to meet the needs of its congregations right now.

“We understand that this decision will be received with mixed emotions,” the latest email said. “This is yet another challenge.

“We are suspending the application of a number of the rules that are used in a typical year both in general, and for rabbinc search specifically.”

A confluence of factors has led to this year’s tight rabbinc labor market. But one of them butter over medium heat, stirring frequently and gently and the butter begins to brown. Remove it from the heat and allow to cool completely while assembling the rest of the ingredients. Combine the flour, baking soda and salt and set aside. Cream the cooled browned butter and the brown sugar in a mixer of food processor until light and fluffy. Add the eggs, one at a time and mix just to combine

Scrape the mixture into the bottom of the prepared pan, level the batter so it covers the caramel portion evenly. Bake for 45–50 minutes, rotate the pan once halfway through the baking. The cake will be a deep golden brown, spring back lightly when pressed lightly.

Allow the cake to cool for 10 minutes. Use potholders or a towel and flip the cake over onto a serving plate, carefully remove the pan. You may need to use a knife to gently separate the layers from the pan. If the prunes stick to the bottom of the pan, simply press them back into place. Again, allow 10–15 minutes to finishing before slicing the cake. ■ seems to be that the Great Resignation — a mass wave of resignations across the United States triggered during the COVID-19 pandemic — has come for the rabbinate, with potentially major implications for American Jewish communities.

In what appears to be a blip, the first year of the pandemic saw fewer incidents of baby-boomer-aged rabbis. Rabbi Ilana Garber, the Rabbinical Assembly’s director of global rabbinical development, calls these rabbis “kind souls” who stayed because it was the right thing to do for their congregation during a time of crisis.

This year, there’s a bumper crop of retirements, while a thinning out of the next generation that was already underway continues.

Denominational seminaries are ordaining fewer clergy, and fewer of those being orduced are choosing to assume the pulpit.

Another dynamic has emerged as the pandemic has worn on: More rabbis are choosing to retire early. And a significant number of rabbis have decided to leave their congregational jobs mid-career, many times with no intention of serving in another pulpit again.

Some of them, in keeping with one theme of the Great Resignation, say they are no longer willing to tolerate unpleasant workning conditions. One rabbi told the Jewish Telegraphic Agency that “an atmosphere that stifles innovation, enthusiasm and initiative” and “pulul-crushing” is taking a toll. Rabbinical Asdom congregations are also seeing an increased number of openings because of a surge in retirements this year, according to Rabbi Janet Offel, the director of consulting and transition management at the Union for Reform Judaism.

But it is within the Conservative movement where concern is sharpest. The Conservative synagogues hiring this year represent a broad cross-section of the movement, which is home to about 17% of American Jews, according to a recent survey by the Pew Reform.

Some are growing and adding a second rabbis. Many are in regions that are attractive to Conservative rabbis because they offer Jewish day schools and kosher dining options. But even some synagogues in major metropolitan areas appear to be struggling to find suitable candidates: A Conservative congregation in Montreal took the unusual step of buying a quarter-page ad in the Jerusalem Post this week to alert its readers that it is seeking a full-time senior rabbi.

Synagogues in areas with dwindling Jewish populations, where few amenities of Jewish life are likely to be present for rabbis and their families, may be having even more trouble drumming up rabbincial candidates. One synagogue in Kalamazoo, Michigan, told its congregants earlier this month that a single application had come through the Conservative movement hiring system.

In more isolated communities, going without rabbis could be a blow to the sense of Jewish life. And hiring a rabbi from outside the Conservative movement could change a synagogue community’s character — a reality that the most recent letter from the move-group movement suggested guarding against.

“We urge you to ask questions about their policies to be sure that the rabbi’s views are consistent with Conservative Judaism and your community’s values and priorities.”

Within the movement, officials expect a substantial number of synagogues to end the hiring season without a new rabbi under contract. Their concern is so acute that a team of 25 leaders has convened to discuss a looming questions: If synagogues can’t reasonably assured of rabbis from within the movement, why should they continue to pay dues to belong to it?

“About a month ago we started really having some serious conversations about this when the numbers made clear to us that this was going to be something we needed to address for this year,” Garber said. “We do very much believe in the movement and that we need to strengthen this movement and answer the questions of why should I affiliate with this movement?”

Part of the answer could come with how the Rabbinical Assembly and United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, which efc effectively merged in 2020, handle synagogues that end up without rabbis. The December letter outlined a range of possibilities, including creating a “cadre of transitional rabbis” to hold positions for a short time; initiating rabbi-sharing and other “outside the box” structures; and launching virtual programs “to ease the pressure on clergy.”

Garber said the task force — which includes representatives from the movement’s groups; deans from the Jewish Theological Seminary and American Jewish University, the movement’s two seminaries; and rabbis and cantors from various synagogues — had alighted on a plan. She declined to share details but said “an exciting opportunity” will come into play when, in not too long, the search process is resolved and the synagogues without rabbis seek help.

“Then they come to us and say, ‘what?’” she said. “And we’ll say, all right, we’ve got some options for you.”

The first urban Jewish cohousing project in the US takes shape in Berkeley

Sue Fishkoff, originally from J. The Jewish News of Northern California via JTA

Clean lines, a four-story building arranged around an open courtyard, and parking spaces for 50 bicycles are all part of the recently completed design for Berkeley Moshav, an intentional Jewish cohousing community planned for a 2024 opening in Berkeley, California.

The community submitted plans to the city in mid-December, and groundbreaking should begin in 18 months, said project organizer Roger Studley. The first residents should be able to move in by late 2024.

When they do, they will be moving into the country’s first urban Jewish cohousing community.

No other location besides Berkeley was considered, Studley said. From the first living-room meeting of 19 interested families almost eight years ago, the idea was to build their future home walking distance from the city’s two downtown synagogues — Netivot Shalom and Beth Israel — and to take advantage of Berkeley’s growing Jewish population, as well as its history of social and spiritual innovation.

Upon completion, the project will have 36 to 39 units, depending on the final configuration of several one- and two-bedroom homes. Seven family units have committed to move in so far, and several more are being tabbed as “explorers,” those taking a few months to meet their prospective neighbors and decide whether the community is right for them.

In a cohousing community, residents are expected to take part in certain communal activities. They all own the building and the land in common, so decisions about the community overall are decided in monthly meetings. Residents don’t have to attend the meetings but must abide by the decisions.

The cohousing movement started in Denmark in the 1960s and came to the United States a generation later. Muir Commons, established in Davis, California, in 1991, is the oldest such community in the country. There are now some 170 cohousing communities nationwide, and while a few are faith-based, just one is intentionally Jewish: Living Tree Alliance, a kibbutz-inspired farmland in Moretown, Vermont, which comprises a handful of homes.

Berkeley Moshav is quite different, both in scale (large and urban) and in lifestyle (well, Berkeley).

Following the model of the Israeli moshav, members will own their own homes with all shared space held in common. That will include a 5,000-square-foot outdoor courtyard, 3,000 square feet of indoor space for amenities such as art and fitness studios; a rooftop terrace for Jewish ritual celebrations; and two communal kitchens: one dairy and one meat. There will be 24 parking spaces, but 12 will be reserved for ride-share vehicles — that’s both to keep expenses down and to honor the project’s commitment to sustainability, Studley said.

Discussions are ongoing regarding the Jewish character of the community, which will be open to non-Jews as well. From the beginning, Studley said, the idea was to accommodate all observance levels and none, but that’s more complicated than it sounds. He said there will be “a Shabbat vibe” in the common areas, but what does that mean in practice? And kashrut details for the communal kitchens will be worked out as members evolve; what residents do in their private homes is up to them. These are all works in progress, to be decided and re-decided by the community itself.

That’s part of what attracted Noah Brod, 35, and Hilary Jacobsen, 33, to the prospect. The couple served together in the Peace Corps in El Salvador, which is where they got their first taste of communal living: 14 people of multiple generations in a four-bedroom house.

“It was a pretty profound revelation to us,” Brod said. “This is how most of the world lives. It made us more open to the idea of intentional communities.”

And while that living style has its ups and downs, he said, “It’s a rich way to live your life.”

The idea of being multigenerational appeals to them. “We are looking for a place to raise a family, with other parents around,” Brod said. The Jewish character is also key for them. Jacobsen has deep roots in the East Bay Jewish community; her grandmother, the late Ilene Weinreb, was a local philanthropist and activist, serving on the boards of the East Bay Jewish federation and Berkeley Hillel, among others.

The two are still in the “explorers” stage with Berkeley Moshav, “crunching the numbers,” as Brod put it.

Prices have gone up since the location on San Pablo Avenue was announced in 2019. They are now projected to range from $880,000 for a one-bedroom to $1.6 million for three-bedroom units. Studley explained that these are market-rate homes, and the prices are estimates of what they will go for three years from now. Also, they are being built to the future homeowners’ specifications, and will be sold at cost.

“What I like is that it’s a discussion,” Brod said of the process. “Everything else in the Bay Area is: ‘Here’s the price, take it or leave it, you’re lucky to get anything.’ I’m really happy there is this option for us even to explore.”

Elly Valas, 72, signed on to Berkeley Moshav two years ago. A former small-business consultant, she lives in Denver, but has two sisters in Berkeley and a lot of other family in the state. She and some college friends have been talking about cohousing for decades, but now that she’s single and getting older, it has become a priority.

“I don’t want to age alone,” she said. She’s looked at some elder cohousing communities, but that doesn’t appeal to her. “I don’t want to live in an old-age home.”

She has friends and family who have lived on kibbutz, some for years, and she said she’s “always thought it was a great way to live. I’ve seen how it can work, and I’m familiar with the challenges.

‘I’d say I’m the most involved’ of the seven confirmed Berkeley Moshav members, she said, noting that she is on the marketing committee, the design and development committee, and writes the newsletter.

The challenge now is finding more people to commit to the project. Construction can begin once 75 percent of the homes are spoken for, which means they need 20 more families or individuals to sign on.

Word is spreading, however. Valas got a call last week from a man boarding a plane to Hawaii, who said he’d found out about Berkeley Moshav from the bulletin board at Congregation Beth El in Berkeley.

“I think there are many people waiting on the sidelines to see what it will look like, what kind of Jewish community it will be,” she mused.

“I think this is the way we are meant to live,” Studley said. “We are so much happier when we have a place to connect, where we belong.”

In Manhattan, 24 women artists celebrate 24 women rabbis who blazed a trail

Emily Jaeger, originally for the New York Jewish Week via JTA

The glass ceiling of rabbinical ordination was broken at Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in Cincinnati in 1972 when Rabbi Sally J. Priesand became America’s first female rabbi. Fifty years later, HUC’s New York City branch is celebrating the milestone with an exhibit at its Dr. Bernard Heller Museum.

The exhibition, called “Holy Sparks,” pairs 24 female rabbis — all “firsts” of some kind — with 24 female Jewish artists asked to portray their stories. A collaboration between HUC and The Braid (formerly Jewish Women’s Theatre), a Santa Monica, Calif.-based Jewish theater company, “Holy Sparks” reflects upon the radical and essential shifts in Judaism over the past five decades through the inclusion of representation, there are notable omissions. There are no pieces dedicated to Rabbi Priesand with a subdued photograph that is overlaid with a famous quote from the rabbi: “The world moves forward every day because someone is willing to take the risk.”

For Emily Bowen Cohen, the Jewish Wonderer, an art form of representation, there are notable omisions. Rosensaft said.

Some of the included artists had long, close friendships with their rabbis; others referenced transcripts and videos provided by The Braid. The artists only had to follow one rule: keep their pieces within the dimensions of 24”x 30” for easy transport. With its next stop at the Skirball Museum in Cincinnati, “Holy Sparks” is intended as a traveling exhibit, to share the story of these inspirations.

The process could be difficult at times. Painter Marilee Tolwin, for example, struggled to encompass the essence of Rabbi Rachel Adler — one of the first ethicists to interpret Jewish texts through a feminist lens — on a mere 24” x 30” canvas. Her piece evokes both Agnes Martin’s modernist grid paintings and micrography, a Jewish form of calligraphy where quotations written in tiny Hebrew letters are used to create designs. Tolwin copied Adler’s entire landmark feminist essay, “The Jew Who Wasn’t There,” from a miniature page of a Talmud, for which sentence had fallen in the middle of a page.

Marlene Gitelman z”l, a remembrance
By Nehama Glogower
“Say little and do much and receive every person with a kindly appearance” Avot 1:15

Marlene Gitelman, a quiet pillar of the Ann Arbor Jewish community. A native of Detroit, Marlene Cern graduated from Mumford High School. Her family were dedicated members of Young Israel of Northwest Detroit. While a student at Wayne State University, she volunteered in Israel following the Six Day War, extending her stay so she could continue to work on Kibbutz Ti-rat Zvi in the Beit She’an Valley. The family’s love and attachment to Israel was cemented when her parents, David and Sarah, moved to Israel in 1969, along with Marlene’s sister Naomi, joining her brother Yehuda, who was getting his PhD at the Weizmann Institute.

Marlene completed a BA in Education from Wayne State University. She met Zvi Gitelman, a newly appointed professor at the University of Michigan; they soon married and made their home in Ann Arbor. The Orthodox Jewish community was tiny and matched at the Michigan Hillel building.

When the children Yitzhak and Miriam were born, the Gitelmans and a few other families recognized a need for a Jewish school in Ann Arbor, one that could provide intensive Hebrew and Jewish education, alongside outstanding secular studies. Thus, the Hebrew Day School of Ann Arbor was born. Marlene became the head of the school. Under her steady guidance the school grew and became an important anchor of Jewish life in Ann Arbor.

To say that Marlene poured her heart and soul into the school doesn’t even begin to capture the depth of her commitment. She was principal for 18 years, providing leadership and a solid foundation for the school, parents, teachers, and students. She was deeply committed to Jewish education, to Israel, and to making a school where everyone on the Jewish spectrum of observance could feel safe and comfortable. She cared deeply about children.

Marlene did not seclude herself in the principal’s office. You would find her setting up the Purim carnival or the Passover seder or removing hazardous spills from the hallway. She knew what was going on in each classroom, she knew each child. In her quiet, modest way she modeled menschlichkeit (decent) in the best possible way.

Marlene was always on the lookout for needs in the community and then volunteered to do what needed to be done. Many organizations, especially the Ann Arbor Or thodox Minyan, benefited from her efforts. She never shirked what she considered to be her responsibility. Whether it was shopping for Kiddush foods or rebinding ragged prayer books, she did it.

The Gitelman home was welcoming to everyone on the Jewish spectrum of observance. It was a place where Marlene could feel safe and comfortable. She loved animals and even snuck a kitten into the house, until she could convince her dad that it really was okay to have a pet. She was the kid who would bring home injured sparrows and nurse them back to health.

When the grandkids came along she became “Canaan Savta” every summer. She prepared cool activities and adventures for them, somehow fitting the whole age range. You can see everyone’s face beam into the photographs.

An important Jewish value is Hakarat Haim (decency) in the best possible way. Marlene always had an appreciation for the arts and nature. She was a dedicated photographer, beginning at an early age. Outstanding new books in the TBE library
By Clare Kinberg, TBE librarian

The Sydney Taylor Jewish Book Awards for 2022 were announced in late January, honoring 21 picture books, middle school, and young adult books published last year. Several of these award winning and notable books are now in the Temple Beth Emeth library ready to be savoried. The TBE library is primarily used by TBE religious school students, but its 5000-plus resources are available to any one in the community.

The people’s painter: Ben Shahn’s artful stories of life in America, Cynthia Levinson’s illustrated (by Evan Turk) biography aimed at 4- to 8-year-olds is a complete delight for any age. The complex picture book begins with Shahn’s life in an observant and activist family in Lithuania, follows his development and training as an artist, and illustrates his commitment to social and economic justice. The book joins several others on or about Ben Shahn in the TBE library, including the gorgeous Ben Shahn’s New Deal murals: Jewish identity in the American scene; The complete graphic works of Ben Shahn; and another favorite book for all ages, his illustrated The alphabet of creation: an ancient legend from the Zohar.

Prolific children’s book author Nancy Churnin won two Sydney Taylors this year, a silver award for Dear Mr. Dickens, and her A Queen to the Rescue: The Story of Henrietta Szold, Founder of Hadassah was a Sydney Taylor notable book for 2022. Dear Mr. Dickens tells the story of young Eliza Davis’ correspondence with Charles Dickens about how antisemitism was reflected in Dickens’ portrayal of the Fagin character in Oliver Twist. As a result of Davis’ wise insistence, Dickens revised the book, and in future editions he altered the portrayal of Fagin. The book includes several others on or about Charles Dickens and his work. Many TBE fourth graders are familiar with Dickens revised the book, and in future editions he altered the portrayal of Fagin. The book includes several others on or about Charles Dickens and his work.

Oy, caramba!: an anthology of Jewish stories from Latin America (2016). The library also has his Torah commentary, With all thine heart: love and the Bible (2010). Sheinkin specializes in middle grade and young adult graphic novels and non-fiction on quirky fascinating themes. Many TBE fourth graders are familiar with his humorous graphic series The Adventures of Rabbi Harvey: Jewish Wit and Wisdom in the Wild West (currently 11 copies are on loan, lost, or missing). Another book by Sheinkin in the library is Most dangerous: Daniel Ellsberg and the secret history of the Vietnam War, his 2015 young adult history of the Pentagon Papers.

Want to learn more about new books in the TBE library? Join me on Sunday evenings, 6 to 7 p.m. during TBE religious school in the library for a “Sunday Salon” discussion of books and current events. What are you reading?
